The Barracuda Lake is a unique and breathtaking natural wonder located on the island of Coron in Palawan, Philippines. It is renowned for its crystal-clear turquoise waters, dramatic limestone cliffs, and its intriguing thermocline phenomenon.

What sets Barracuda Lake apart from other lakes is its distinct combination of freshwater and saltwater layers. The top layer consists of warm freshwater, while the lower layer is saltwater. The transition zone between these layers is known as the thermocline, where the temperature and visibility can change dramatically.

The lake's name comes from the presence of barracuda fish that used to inhabit its waters. Although the barracuda population has diminished, the lake remains an enchanting and captivating destination for divers and snorkelers.

Diving or snorkeling in Barracuda Lake is a surreal experience. As you descend into the depths of the lake, you'll witness the thermocline phenomenon firsthand. The warm freshwater layer on the surface gradually gives way to colder, denser saltwater below. The temperature drop can be quite significant, creating a unique sensation for divers.
